BUBBLE BLOWING BIOLOGY

Junior Riley Alves blows bubbles in his AP Biology class for an activity relating to cells. Alves always loved science and had a special interest in biology, leading him to take the class. The bubble lab was a unique experiment made to teach students about the traits of a membrane; whether it was a cell or bubble membrane. "We were learning about the fluidity/flexibility of the cell membrane and its properties. Since bubbles are structured kind of like a cell membrane we were using the lab to see some of the properties of cell membranes," said Alves. Photo by Dhenys Malocas.
