CAN YOU SPELL gklaros-stavropoulos?

NICHOLAS GKAROS-STAVROPOULOS '27 describes how his long last name affects him.

Arguably more important than first names, last names are an important way society differentiates between individuals. A few letters after a first name can separate the first president of the United States from the amazing face of Lancer Live Productions. Most people have last names that land near the average length of around seven letters; however, for freshman NICHOLAS GKAROS-STAVROPOULOS his last name is just a bit longer. At a staggering 19 characters, excluding the hyphen, he has encountered a few annoyances throughout his life due to his long last name. "Especially on tests or worksheets, having to write my full name can be a pain sometimes, or when people are calling attendance they often mess it up," says GKAROS-STAVROPOULOS. Even from a younger age, he encountered issues surrounding having to comprehend his name. GKAROS-STAVROPOULOS says, "I could only spell my last name when I was in second or third grade. I wanted to learn fast when I was younger, but it took me a while. I had to ask my dad, and I said it out loud a lot." The length of his name is sometimes a tedious task, but he has found a way to work around it. "Because the name is hyphenated, I do shorten it sometimes. I'll just say 'Gklaros' or 'Stavropoulos,'" says GKAROS-STAVROPOULOS.
